The Redfield Will

It Looked All Right When Made, but Did Not Pan Out Well

By F. A. MITCHEL

****************** When the late John Redfield's will was opened it was learned that all his property-a goodly fortune-was left to his daughter Anne, with the condition that she marry the testator's right hand man of business. Theodore Griffin. Griffin had been in charge of the Redfield company for some time before its founder's demise, and since he was the only man who could squeeze a profit out of it there was no necessity for making any other provision for its management. Nothing was said in the will as to a refusal of Griffin to marry Anne Redfield. Her father when she was passing into womanhood had told her that it was his intention to give her a good manager for the fortune be would leave her, in the person of Griffin. Anne was then too young to consider the importance of the plan to her, and her father was led to believe that she would make no objection to it ditions. There was no doubt about Griffin's acceding to it.

This is why the will made no mention of a refusal on the part of Griffin to marry the helress. If she refused to marry him the stock of the Redfield company, which would otherwise be hers, would go to Griffin. The residue of the estate would in this case be divided between several charitable instientions in which the testator had been much interested during his life.

Mr. Redfield dled four years after mentioning the matter to his daughter. When he did so she was fifteen. At the time of his death she was nineteen, She had told some of her schoolmates that she was to marry Griffin and had made no objection to doing so. At that time it was a matter for the future, and she considered it a matter of course, as a boy may do who is brought up to understand that he is to enter a certain profession.

But when Anne Redfield at nineteer found herself an orphan and called upon to fulfill the conditions of her father's will she was a woman and had a lover who had nothing whatever to do with the condition except that if she married him she would give up a fortune.

David Corwin was the young man who had stepped in to prevent John Redfleid's well conceived plan from being smoothly worked out. David had been attentive to Anne for some time before her father's death, but Mr. Redfield was not observant, and quite often parents who are watchful fail to detect a love affair that is developing right under their noses. This one came to a head during Mr. Redfield's last ill-

When the will was read Anne was reminded of something the importance of which she had not realized and which, never having been mentioned to known." her since she was fifteen years old, she regarded as a dead letter. But even now it did not occur to her that and told him that she could not marry her father's choice for her without vio lation to her feelings. Griffin replied that he had promised ber father to do his part in carrying out the plant if Anne would not do her part he saw no ber business manager, the man who way but that the property, other than had introduced Griffin, and Griffin told the business, most go to the charities named in the will. Anne consulted a lawyer, who told she must marry Griffin to inherit her There was but one way out of the dilemma, and that was for Griffin to refuse to marry ber. This would make the will inoperative, and she would inherit as helr at law, the same as if there were no will, she boing the only child and there being no widow. Anne did not understand the learn distinctions in the case, but she did understand that her inheriting her property and marrying the man she wanted depended on Griffin's decitaling to marry ber. She sent for Guilla and reported what the attorney had said,

"This plan," replied Griffin, "was in angurated by your father. It received my sanction, and he told me that you had made no objection to it. I would not be justified in thwarting it by putting you in a position to render it in operative. I regret that the carrying if our has become obnorious to you. but that fact would not ereme me if I become a party to nullifying it."

"But feiber could have had no object to making such a will except to in auro, so far he he could, my happiness Pour years ago be told me about this plan, and I gave my consent to it capable of managing it who has not been brought up for the purpose. You father brought me up for that very pur pose. His object in providing in the will that you should marry me was to insure to you the enjoyment of the wealth he was leaving you. Had he left you free to marry whom you liked you would doubtless have married some young man utterly unfitted to manage fortune that was tied up in a very in tricate business. The result would have been what I have said-ruin for the business and poverty for you. He the business and poverty for you. brought you up with the understanding that you were to marry the man ager of the business he left you.

This sounded so plausible that for the time being Griffin appeared in Anne's eyes a very noble man. It seemed to her that she was the gullty one in not carrying out her father's wishes, to which she had tacitly cor sented. Nevertheless her whole being rebelled against a marriage with Grifof. She would marry the man of ber choice even if she must relinquish a fortune. She was quite sure he would marry her even if she were poor as a church mouse.

But Anne found on consultation with others that they were not disposed to take her view of Griffin's noble motives in not permitting her to enjoy her inheritance with the man she loved by refusing to marry her. Her lawyer told her frankly that Griffin wanted the half million of dollars he would get with her. Corwin said that he wanted her, fortune or no fortune, but some way must be found to persuade or force Griffin to refuse to marry her, when the time came to fulfill the con- thus enabling her to come into her own. He consulted lawyers, who told him that to comply with the statutes Griffin must voluntarily refuse. He could not be trapped or forced into a refusal.

> There was a time limit in the will to Anne's marriage with Griffin. By the time she was twenty-one she must marry him or lose her property. When her father died she had just turned nineteen. Therefore two years rebreeding suitable for heading herds mained before she was compelled to Also a number of farmers buils priced decide. It was decided between David from $100.00 up. Theodore Griffin was one of those men who combine the social and busiusing them in a business way. He used his club, his friends, even his church, for profit. One evening at the opera, scanning the occupants of the boxes, he encountered a pair of binoculars in the hands of a handsomely dressed woman leveled upon him. The glasses were dropped at once, but Griffin wondered why the woman, who was young and well favored, had been gazing at him. Later, pointing to the woman, he asked a friend who she was and was informed that she was Senora De Baraneas, the widow of a Brazilian coffee planter and worth mill-

Griffin found a friend who vouched tention, because she had admired his for appearance, in the reception she gave him, which was, to say the least, cordial. She lamented being in a great city where there was so much to enjoy with no one to enjoy it with except her that it would give him great pleasure to make her stay pleasant. She told him that she had but a week in her that under the terms of the will the city, for she had the misfortune. though a woman, to be burdened with the mapagement of large interests.

Griffin devoted himself to the young widow for a week, at the end of which he prevalled upon her to remain another week. One morning Anne Redfield received a note from an attorney suggesting that a compromise might be effected to the matter of the condition in her father's will requiring her to marry Griffin. Anne referred the note to her attorney, who advised her to begin negotiations by offering Griffin $10,000 to refuse to marry ber.

But before a reply to the offer was received David Corwin turned up and. taking-Ame in his arms, announced that Griffin had been married the eve-

Corwin was in a position to give his tisness a lot of information as to the bride, for he had brought her from Rio de Juneiro himself, had arranged her meeting with Griffin-tudeed, had arranged a trap for that gentleman which had been worked out very succonstully. Senora Daranens was a bired adventuress, and David bad agreed to remunerate her handsomely out of Anna's fortime if she could by
